2. Extension of the navy reserve act for the purpose of forming reserves of power boats, aviators and radio operators and for increasing the desirability of the reserve service to honorably discharged enlisted men of the regular navy. A detailed plan in this connection will be presented to Congress at a later date. The personnel of the present naval auxiliary service should be placed in the naval reserve, the report says, and the light house and coast service men and the equipment also should be placed under navy jurisdiction and training for use in event of war.

3. Increased naval militia appropriations to include the construction of suitable vessels for the Illinois and Minnesota detachments and supplying aeroplanes for naval militia use in training.

4. Construction of an adequate research laboratory for the use of navy engineering and scientific bureaus, and the board of civilian scientists recently created under Thomas A. Edison as chairman. The report states that five million dollars for this purpose was the amount suggested by the civilian board members, but secretary Daniels makes no specific recommendation although he includes a preliminary figure in his estimates for the first year's expenditure.

5. Expenditure of one million dollars to re-engine the battleship North Dakota, the scout cruiser Salem and the destroyers Henley and Mayrant.

6. Construction of a dry dock at the Norfolk yard to accommodate the largest battleship.

7. Further legislation for adequate oil land reserves for the navy.

8. Legislation to make the service more attractive including extended powers to grant discharge by purchase and various changes in rankings.
